

I registered with Indiana's Do Not Call List for its intended purpose - to keep unwanted callers from soliciting me via telephone. As for the banking groups who are now attempting to override this list, I have a suggestion. Is it possible that if a potential consumer is interested in their services that consumer will contact them? I do NOT want their services now and definitely will not in the future should this be overturned. Is taking our rights to privacy away , really worth losing out on members?
